

Public Death Notices

Death Records is one of the key public vital records. It is available free of charge. They are also provided commercially by private information brokers. Being public records, they are accessible by any member of the public. In other words, anyone can conduct a public death records search on anybody. There are variations in restriction and rules governing the retrieval and use of public death records from state to state but by on large, they are quite freely available.

Free public death records can be obtained from both government and private sources. The former can be requested by mail, telephone, fax or in-person. Many states now also have the online option. Private providers of public death records vary widely in the way their records are retrieved. Most of them are tied to a primary product or service and can be quite suspect in intent.

With patience, time and the right attitude, reasonably good free public death record compilation is possible without having to pay for it. The local cognizant government agency is a good starting point if you know where the death occurred. After all, they hold the most original and updated information and are in fact referenced by higher government and commercial information brokers. The problem with free public death records from government offices is that they tend to be raw and non-standardized, far from user-friendly. Be prepared for some degree of further work if they are intended for a functional purpose.

Public death records can provide a lot of information. At a basic level, they contain the personal particulars of the deceased and some degree of his family members'. The age, time, date, place, funeral and burial information are also listed. If there are obituaries records, it would likely be published also. The Death Certificate, records from other categories like Birth and Marriage may also be included. Aside from private and individual purposes, public death records are also widely used in Genealogy, Family Tree and other historical studies.

Free public death records are readily available. The trick is in picking the right source. Log onto the internet and you can find floods of information about Free Public Death Notices. Don't take them all at face value because information regulation and policing on the Web still have a long way to go. Some of them just cannot be trusted.
