

Help your Homeschooler Love to Read

Teaching a child how to read is a crucial part of their education and a major concern for homeschooling families. Strong reading skills are important not just in English class, but in every subject area. Even when you are studying history or biology, good reading and comprehension skills are critical. During the day, homeschooling parents need to create a balance between the different subjects they teach, but reading does not need to be confined to school hours. Encourage your child to read beyond what is required for school work. Children who take up reading as a hobby will perform better in most subjects. Begin prodding your child into reading by getting your child books on topics they are interested in, whether it's tornadoes, insects or airplanes.

Homeschooling parents enjoy the advantage of flexibility. They are not limited by rigid curriculum, study hours, text books or any of the many limitations public school children must stick by. This helps homeschooled children fulfill their potentials as readers. Statistics show that homeschooled children often perform better on standardized reading tests than public school children. Homeschooling allows parents to incorporate reading into everyday routines. For example, you can read to your child before bed or have them read to you and that can be a part of their reading lesson for the day. Homeschooling doesn't have to confine reading lessons to study hours.

Establishing reading as a habit is not only beneficial for your child's reading skills but also helps add to their knowledge base. Encourage your children to read a wide variety of books, including fiction and non-fiction. Fictional stories are great to get your child's imagination soaring and non-fiction is important for developing a wide knowledge base.

An easy way to encourage your child to read during free time is to make a wide range of reading material available around the house where kids can see it and reach it easily. You should never force your child to read or make reading feel like a chore or punishment. In fact reading should be viewed as a pleasure and a treat. Modeling good behavior is one of the best ways for parents to instill a trait in their children. Therefore, make sure your child catches you reading once in a while. That will definitely encourage them to pick up a book for themselves.

The best education for a child is a well-rounded one, but no matter which method of educating you choose for child, reading will always be an important part of it. This is because reading is a building block necessary for all forms of higher education. Make sure you begin to instill a love for reading in your children from a young age to ensure that they develop reading as a habit and enjoy its many benefits for years to come.

About the Author

For more effective homeschool reading assignments to help with your homeschooler's reading skills. Find out more homeschooling resources

Source: <http://www.article-idea.com>